NEW QUESTION: 2

Your eyes are about three inches apart. That's more than trivia -- it's the reason you see the world in three dimensions. The separation gives your eyes two slightly different views of every scene you encounter. In the brain's visual cortex, these views are compared, and the overlap is translated into a stereoptic picture.

To estimate relative distances, your brain takes a reading of the tension in your eye muscles.

But you only see in 3-D up to about 200 feet. Beyond that, you might as well be one-eyed -- your eyes aren't far enough apart to give two very different views over long distances. Instead, you rely on experience to judge where things are; the brain looks for clues and makes its best guess. For example, it knows that near objects overlap far ones; that bright objects are closer than dim ones; and that large objects are nearer than small ones.

These "monocular cues" are what painters use to trick us into thinking a flat canvas is three-dimensional and miles deep. That's why paintings are much more convincing if you close one eye: Your brain hunts down all the clues the painter has dropped. But when both of your eyes are open, the brain gets more information and mixed signals. The paint may say miles, but the muscles in your eyes say inches.

All of this fancy eyework is second nature to us, but it is learned. "Other cultures don't perceive pictures the same way we do," says J Anthony Movshon, Ph.D., associate professor of psychology at New York University. "For example, primitive people don't always think bigger means nearer. It's our Western way of seeing things, and it's a way of seeing that we've learned." The primary purpose of the passage is to explain

- A. the difference between Western and primitive cultures.
- B. how we see in three dimensions.
- C. why your eyes are three inches apart.
- D. the use of 3-D paintings.

NEW QUESTION: 3

IOP's product is manufactured using a production process that is known to have a defect rate of 10%.

IOP's quality control department has developed a test that has a 98% probability of classifying a non-defective item correctly and a 2% probability of classifying a non-defective item as defective.

The same test has a 95% probability of classifying a defective item correctly and a 5% probability of classifying a defective item as non-defective.

Calculate the proportion of IOP's output that will be classified as non-defective by the quality control department's test.

Give your answer to one decimal place.
